

Upcoming Magical Adventure

Papercraft Games is quietly developing a future adventure game built around magic, exploration, mystery, and worlds that are not holding together the way they should.

The project is still early, still mostly under wraps, and not expected to release anytime soon. For now, we are only sharing the shape of the experience, not the secrets inside it.

The Setup

A strange dimensional rift pulls the player into a fractured magical crisis.

What begins as an accident becomes a journey through unstable places, old magic, hidden truths, and corruption spreading through the cracks.

There are rare magical objects involved.

There are rifts that should not be open.

There are worlds where reality feels bent, broken, or stitched together wrong.

And underneath it all is a question about power: what it is for, what it costs, and what happens when it is used carelessly.

The Feel

This game is meant to feel magical, cozy, strange, playful, and mysterious.

It has charm on the surface, but there is more going on underneath. Expect colorful magic, unusual places, strange discoveries, and emotional sincerity beneath the adventure.

Not grim.

Not cynical.

Just beautiful enough to invite you in, and broken enough to make you wonder what happened.

Gameplay Direction

The project is planned as an exploration-focused adventure with magical progression, environmental puzzles, dimensional spaces, collectible artifacts, and a mystery that unfolds over time.

Specific details are being kept quiet for now. The best parts should be discovered when the game is ready.

Built with Folded Paper Engine

This game is planned around Folded Paper Engine, Papercraft Games' Blender-to-Godot workflow for building layered, stylized game worlds with a handmade papercraft feel.

More will be revealed later.